Research on Campus

Connecticut College professors are making important discoveries, and students are integral to that process. Faculty are awarded more than $1 million a year in federal research grants, and they work with students on innovative research in nearly every field. From developing genetic algorithms that enable robots to “learn” to examine the effects of the BP oil spill on salt marshes to sifting through Civil War-era health records to uncovering a previously unreported smallpox epidemic that changed the course of American history – opportunities abound.
